A Pupil of Charcot. Three thousand dollars has just changed hands in an elegant apartment on Fifth avenue, New York. Four men in evening dress were sented in careless attitudes about a circular table, each sipping a demi-tasse, after a banquet of unusual excellence.

Three of the men were evidently Americans; the fourth was proclaimed a Frenchman by the cut of his imperial and the upward curl of his mustaches. "Talk of hypnotism and mesmerism," he had said, "I tell you, gentlemen, that thought transferrence is in its in-tancy. The experiments of M. Charcot are but child's play compared with the astounding results to be achieved before the birth of another century. Every thought that comes into being in the mind of a man is a living entity endowed at birth with a power for good or evil the magnitude of which is beyond our wildest dreams. gentlemen, even I, a private citizen of La Belle, France, to whom the subject of thought transferrence has been as vet but a diversion for idle hours-even I, without reputation as a mesmerist and lacking the wondrous power of the adepts of the East, can cause each one of you to spring to your feet in astonishment. "Gentlemen, I will pour from the decanter in this cabinet a glass of wine, and in the instant of time which passes as I raise the glass to my lips I shall influence a human being a half a mile away who is not cognizant of my exis tence to such an extent that he will feel and know the desire I - have conceived in me for his presence. He will come to me, not knowing why he comes, subject to my will, and willing to testify to you as to the impelling force which guided his footsteps. On this sheet of paper I will describe the room, his general appearance; yes, I will go still further. I will foretell whatever object he may carry in hand I will wager $1,000 that my statement will be substantiated by a test.

The Frenchman hastily wrote a few words on a piece of paper, folded it and enclosed it in an envelope, which he scaled. He then stepped to the cabinet and poured a glass of sherry from a decanter, saying:

"Sherry, gentlemen, is my lucky drink. I shall drink sherry on my wedding morning. It is a wine which, by right of many good and vivifying qualities, belongs to the weaker and better sex, but because woman's intuitions are akin to the subtle workings of the brain in thought transference I shall drink the drink of womankind. Gentlemen, with this glass of sherry I pledge your health." He drained the glass and placed it on the cabinet with a flourish.

"I have made the impression T believed possible," he said. "I have reason to believe the person described in that scaled sheet of paper is now apa silver case, from which each took a Russian cigarette.

Before you have half finished your cigarettes, my friends," he continued, "you shall admit that mind is superior matter and that there are powers in this universe superior even to mind or
